The dog has been ever the miserable victim of most cruel experiments by the anatomist and philosopher, and when a tax was laid on his head, a general massacre of the species took place. Every one has observed that dogs before they lie down turn themselves round and round several times. Those who have an apportunity of witnessing the actions of aniunity of witnessing the actions of ani-muls in a wild state, know that they seek long grass for their beds, which they best down and rander more commodious by turning round in it several times. It would appear, therefore, that the habit of our domestic dogs in this respect is de-rived from the nature of the same species in a wild state. This is a curious fact, and serves to prove how much the instinctive habits of wild animals are retained by their domesticated property.
